The war professors

In the past quarter-century, the U. S. government has created a network of scientific advisory panels to the Pentagon. These panels, composed of the nation's leading academic scientists, provide the government with instant access to the university scientific community when help or advice is needed for the development of new weapons systems.

Members of these panels enjoy access to the centers of governmental decision-making. The Defense Science Board (DSB) reports directly to the Secretary of Defense, while the President's Science Advisory Committee (PSAC) works closely with the staff of the White House. Each of the armed services has an advisory committee; these are: the Air Force Science Advisory Board (AFSAB), the Army Scientific Advisory Panel (ASAP), and the Naval Research Advisory Committee (NRAC). The Jason Division of the Institute for Defense Analysis works closely with the Pentagon's Advanced Research Projects Agency.

Because members of such groups are active in both the university and military spheres (while often serving simultaneously as consultants to, or directors of, defense-oriented corporations), these panels should be viewed as comprising the infrastructure of the university-military complex. The panels perform essential services to the government by: informing the Pentagon of scientific discoveries applicable to weapons development; finding the scientists best able to accomplish a specified research task; recruiting graduate students for military research programs; providing a reservoir of scientific manpower available for work on crash military projects.

ATOMS AND MEN

Cosmic 'Glue' Plot Thickens

BY IRVING S. BENGELSDORF, Ph.D.

Times Science Editor

TUE FEB 14 1967

There are stars and planets, mice, men, amoebas and atoms. Obviously, cosmic forces are at work to put things together as discrete separate units.

But is there a "star force" that prevents stars from flying apart? Is there a "mouse force" that keeps mice "glued" together? Not at all. As far as we know, the physical nature of everything in the universe results from only four different forces.

There is electromagnetism that serves as the glue that keeps individual atoms and combinations of atoms stuck together. It is the second most powerful force and can make itself felt over great distances. And there is gravity, the weakest force of the four, that anchors man to Earth and keeps the heavens bound together.

Theories in physics indicate that each of the four forces should make itself felt by having "go-betweens" or "messengers" to carry the force between objects. In the case of electromagnetic force, these "go-betweens" are known as photons.

Gravitons Are Hypothetical

Physicists also think gravity has "go-betweens" called "gravitons." Speaking at Caltech's 75th anniversary conference, Dr. Murray Gell-Mann, recently appointed Caltech's first Robert Andrews Millikan Professor of Physics, stated, "But, nobody can figure out any way, with present technology, of doing an experiment to find it. Thus, the graviton remains a hypothetical particle."

Both electromagnetism and gravity were recognized forces before 1900. The two remaining forces, known as the "weak" force and the "strong" force, were discovered in the 20th century. Both deal with events that take place inside atomic nuclei. Thus, they are "short-range" forces.

In contrast to electromagnetism and gravity that make themselves felt over distances that span the entire observable universe, the weak and strong forces only act over distances as small as one-trillionth the thickness of a dime!

The weak force is responsible for the release of electrons and neutrinos when certain atomic nuclei decay or fall apart. Its strength lies between that of gravity and electromagnetism. Nobody has yet demonstrated the existence of "W-particles," the proposed "go-betweens" of the weak force.

The most powerful force of the four is known appropriately as the "strong" force. It keeps the tiny central nucleus of an atom "glued" together and, thus, is responsible for nuclear bombs and nuclear power.

plants. And so, to find out more about the strong force, physicists turned their attention to what was inside the atomic nucleus.

Within atomic nuclei are still smaller subnuclear particles called protons and neutrons. At one time, it was thought that protons and neutrons were "fundamental" particles of matter held together by strong force "go-betweens" known as pi-mesons or pions. The pions served as "nuclear glue."

100 Different Varieties

But, by using high energy accelerators to shoot high speed particles at atomic nuclei, scientists now have uncovered more than 100 different varieties of subnuclear particles besides protons and neutrons, and a large number of varieties of mesons in addition to pions.

So, there is no apparent reason why protons and neutrons should be any more "fundamental" than the 100 other known subnuclear particles, nor should pions be any more "gluey" than other mesons.

Gell-Mann points out that, at present, there are two possible schemes to try to explain the number and nature of subnuclear particles involved in the strong force. One, called the "bootstrap" scheme, suggests that each variety of subnuclear particle is a composite made up of other subnuclear particles.

Thus, each subnuclear particle can change into another variety by giving away or taking in some other kind of subnuclear particle. And so, it is the continuous exchange of particles among themselves that gives rise not only to the various subnuclear particles, but also to the strong force that binds them together.

The second scheme to try to explain the various subnuclear particles says that they are made up of even smaller units called "quarks." If they exist, quarks indeed are particles with exceedingly strange properties. Thus far, quarks remain hypothetical; they have not been observed as real objects and simply may be mathematical expressions that exist only in the minds of theoretical physicists. But, the quark scheme does explain a great deal about subnuclear particles.

So which scheme is correct: bootstrap or quark? Gell-Mann concludes, "The quark scheme—if quarks only are mathematical—and the bootstrap scheme could be different ways of looking at the same theory, and both could be correct. It also is possible, of course, that both are wrong."

From quarks to bootstraps, the incredibly tiny world of the subatomic nucleus remains an exciting scientific challenge.

Award Given to Physicist

PASADENA —Caltech announced Thursday one of its physicists, Dr. Murray Gell-Mann, 39, has been named the recipient of a $10,000 award for his work in theoretical physics.

Gell-Mann was cited for his contributions to the understanding of elementary particles. Last year he discovered a new sub-nuclear particle, called Omega Minus, which led to the revision of many theories about the behavior of particles in the heart of an atom.

Gell-Mann will receive the award Jan. 23 in New York by the Research Corp., a nonprofit board of scientific experts concerned with advancing all fields of research.

Dwarfs or Baryons,
Predictions Pay Off

BY IRVING BENGELSDORF

Times Science Writer

Once upon a time, in the middle of a vast impenetrable swamp on the island of Hadros, there stood a tiny house. Although smoke poured out of its chimney and candlelight shone through its windows at night, the people who lived at the edge of the swamp had never seen the residents of the tiny cottage.

One day, the King of Hadros ordered a census taken to determine the population of his subjects. He wanted every head in the kingdom counted. But this created a problem. Nobody could get across the treacherous swamp to find out who, and how many, lived in the tiny home in the center of the bog. Finally, the minister in charge of Insoluble Problems decided to hurl stones at the house. Under a barrage of bombarding stones, whoever lived in the house would come out, be identified, and be counted.

So, a huge slingshot was erected at the swamp's rim. When the first stones hit the tiny house, four extremely strange-looking dwarfs jumped out and were captured. One of the dwarfs had only a left hand, one had no hands, one had only a right hand, and one had two right hands. Each of these four dwarfs weighed 1,240 ounces.

Each Weighs More

Were there more dwarfs? The slingshot hurled bigger stones and another three dwarfs jumped out. One had only a left hand, one only a right hand, and one had no hands. The dwarfs in this second group were heavier than the original four. Each of the three weighed 1,385 ounces.

Perhaps, bigger stones would flush out even more dwarfs. So, the slingshot hurled small boulders at the cottage, and two more dwarfs ran out. One dwarf had no hands, while the other had only a left hand. They were the heaviest dwarfs yet. Each of the pair weighed 1,530 ounces.

It so happened that one of the professors at the University of Hadros, had worked out a very complicated mathematical theory that could describe the number and nature of dwarfs who inhabited inaccessible cottages. When he heard that nine dwarfs would be found to have one left hand and to weigh 1,675 ounces.

And so, a super slingshot, called the Breakheavy Hurler was called into pitch enormously heavy boulders at the cottage. For two years, nothing happened. Then, one day, a single dwarf jumped out. Lo and behold, it, indeed, had only one left hand and weighed 1,675 ounces! It was a beautiful demonstration that the professor's mathematical theory really could predict the nature and number of dwarfs living in inaccessible cottages.

Fairy tale? Not at all. Instead of inaccessible cottages, there are sub-microscopically tiny nuclei of atoms. Instead of dwarfs inside cottages, there are sub-nuclear particles called baryons. The commonly known proton and neutron are examples of baryons.

And instead of a particular family of 10 related dwarfs, an atomic nucleus contains a particular family of 10 related baryons. Instead of right or left hands, or no hands, baryons have positive or negative electrical charges, or no electrical charges. FEB 26 1955

Instead of slingshots hurling stones, machines called accelerators fling sub-nuclear particles at atomic nuclei targets. And it was Mr. Murray Gell-Mann, the Robert Andrews Millikan professor of physics at Caltech, who proposed a mathematical theory that suggested that various baryons would be found to make up groups of families of specific number.

How It Happened

While attending a scientific meeting, Dr. Gell-Mann heard experimental physicists report the discovery of two new baryons. They turned out to be No. 8 and 9 in a family of 10 baryons he had predicted—and of which seven then were known. He immediately jumped to the blackboard and pointed out that there should be another baryon—the 10th in his predicted family—and that it would be found to have a single negative charge and would have a mass equal to 1,675 million electron volts.

Two years later, physicists using the Breakheavy

Hadros ordered a census taken to determine the population of his subjects. He wanted every head in the kingdom counted. But this created a problem. Nobody could get across the treacherous swamp to find out who, and how many, lived in the tiny home in the center of the bog. Finally, the minister in charge of Insoluble Problems decided to hurl stones at the house. Under a barrage of bombarding stones, whoever lived in the house would come out, be identified, and be counted.

So, a huge slingshot was erected at the swamp's rim. When the first stones hit the tiny house, four extremely strange-looking dwarfs jumped out and were captured. One of the dwarfs had only a left hand, one had no hands, one had only a right hand, and one had two right hands. Each of these four dwarfs weighed 1,240 ounces. 2-5-1

Each Weighs More

Were there more dwarfs? The slingshot hurled bigger stones and another three dwarfs jumped out. One had only a left hand, one only a right hand, and one had no hands. The dwarfs in this second group were heavier than the original four. Each of the three weighed 1,385 ounces.

Perhaps, bigger stones would flush out even more dwarfs. So, the slingshot hurled small boulders at the cottage, and two more dwarfs ran out. One dwarf had no hands, while the other had only a left hand. They were the heaviest dwarfs yet. Each of the pair weighed 1,530 ounces.

It so happened that one of the professors at the University of Hadros, had worked out a very complicated mathematical theory that could describe the number and nature of dwarfs who inhabited inaccessible cottages. When he heard that nine dwarfs, with varying numbers of hands, had been captured in three groups—a quartet, a triplet, and a duet—and that the dwarfs in each group weighed 145 ounces more than the dwarfs in the previously captured group, his mathematical theory led him to a startling announcement.

He predicted there was a 10th dwarf still remaining in the cottage and that it weighed 1,675 ounces! It was a beautiful demonstration that the professor's mathematical theory really could predict the nature and number of dwarfs living in inaccessible cottages.

Fairy tale? Not at all. Instead of inaccessible cottages, there are sub-microscopically tiny nuclei of atoms. Instead of dwarfs inside cottages, there are sub-nuclear particles called baryons. The commonly known proton and neutron are examples of baryons.

And instead of a particular family of 10 related dwarfs, an atomic nucleus contains a particular family of 10 related baryons. Instead of right or left hands, or no hands, baryons have positive or negative electrical charges, or no electrical charges. FEB 26 1968

Instead of slingshots hurling stones, machines called accelerators fling sub-nuclear particles at atomic nuclei targets. And it was Mr. Murray Gell-Mann, the Robert Andrews Millikan professor of physics at Caltech, who proposed a mathematical theory that suggested that various baryons would be found to make up groups of families of specific number.

How It Happened

While attending a scientific meeting, Dr. Gell-Mann heard experimental physicists report the discovery of two new baryons. They turned out to be No. 8 and 9 in a family of 10 baryons he had predicted—and of which seven then were known. He immediately jumped to the blackboard and pointed out that there should be another baryon—the 10th in his predicted family—and that it would be found to have a single negative charge and would have a mass equal to 1,675 million electron volts.

Two years later, physicists using the Brookhaven Accelerator found the new baryon. It had precisely the properties predicted by Dr. Gell-Mann.

For his "notable contribution to knowledge" in our understanding of the nature of atomic nuclei, Dr. Gell-Mann recently received the 1968 Research Corporation Award—a citation, plaque and $10,000. The ability to predict pays off in many ways.

~~CONFIDENTIAL~~ Defense Analyses (IDA)

The following investigation was conducted May 6, 1969 by SA PAUL F. DOUGHERTY.

KENNETH L. RENKE, Security Assistant, states that the Top Secret clearance issued to MURRAY GELL-MANN on November 16, 1962 continues in effect in connection with his relationship with JASON.

Mrs. MARY GROSSCOPE, Personnel Manager, said that MURRAY GELL-MANN continues to be carried on the rolls as a Consultant to IDA in connection with his service with JASON.

Dr. ROBERT C. TURNER, Assistant to the President for JASON, advised that "JASON" is a group of University Scientists, primarily Physical Scientists the principal activity of which is a group summer study program of six to eight weeks drawn on physical problems affecting the defense picture. IDA finances JASON with a grant from the Defense Department. The group has a steering committee which is semi-managerial requiring attendance of the members at meetings under the above mentioned summer program. The steering committee members serve a term and are "rotated off". JASON also has advisors who may or may not be active. IDA Consultants on the JASON program have minimum contact with the IDA staff.

Dr. TURNER stated that Dr. MURRAY GELL-MANN had rotated off the steering committee of JASON. The steering committee members usually meet one day a month. GELL-MANN's services to JASON included 38 days in calendar 1966, 50 days in 1967 and 24 days in twelve months ending August 31, 1968. GELL-MANN was not in attendance at the entire summer study program in 1968.

Dr. TURNER stated that he did not know MURRAY GELL-MANN well enough to comment concerning him.

NATURE'S BASIC BUILDING BLOCK?

New Tests Show No Evidence of Quarks

TUE APR 24 1973

BY GEORGE ALEXANDER
Times Science Writer

Once again, the quark has proved to be a no-show. 1-3-4

The quark is supposed to be the most basic particle in nature, the smallest building block of matter, the stuff of which protons and neutrons are made.

Ever since California theoretical physicists Murray Gell-Mann and George Zweig predicted its existence about 10 years ago, scientists have painstakingly searched for a real one in laboratory experiments. (Gell-Mann is credited with naming the elusive particle, taking it from "three quarks for Muster Mark" in James Joyce's book "Finnegans Wake").

But scientists from the Lawrence Livermore Laboratory told the meeting of the American Institute of Physics Monday in Washington, D.C., that they were unable to find any quarks in more than 200,000 photographs of cosmic ray tracks in a cloud chamber. A similar 1969 hunt by an Australian physicist also failed to turn up any quarks.

A cloud chamber is a laboratory instrument containing a mist of supersaturated vapor. As highly energetic cosmic rays from outer space zip through the chamber, they shatter any neutrons or protons in their path, spilling subatomic particles like seeds from a split melon.

Arnold F. Clark and a team of Livermore researchers pored over more than 200,000 photographs of such subatomic "seeds," looking for quarks. Although they found 395 "candidate" tracks that might have been made by quarks and 600 other "interesting" traces, the Livermore team eventually concluded that none was the real thing.

Clark said he was pessimistic that quarks would ever be found in the wake of a cosmic ray passage.

Reached at his Pasadena home

Monday, Gell-Mann said that he was neither surprised nor disturbed by the results of the Livermore experiments.

"The proposal by Zweig and myself—made independently of each other, by the way—was not closely tied to the idea that quarks should exist as real, physical, separable, independent particles," Gell-Mann said.

"Instead, we said that the strongly interacting hadrons (neutrons and protons) behave as if they're made up by quarks and antiquarks.

"We felt that it was most likely that these quarks were forever bound up inside the hadrons and most unlikely that they could ever be extracted.

"It's important and exciting that people search for real quarks, but it doesn't hurt the theory (which predicted their existence) if they're not found. The theory has been supported to some extent by other work."
